Being aware of your strengths and weaknesses is essential in daily activities. You evaluate yourself and compare yourself with others; the inner voice tells you the truth better. Analysing yourself and others' values validates the idea that people are more or less powerless in interrelating with God's will.

No one can be perfect in every situation; human imperfection is a common trait.

Each person is a unique construction that evolves differently in varied environments. A suitable workplace, loyal and friendly collaborators, lovely persons or animals around, and healthy habits facilitate the development and use of an individual's full potential. By contrast, excessive envy, lack of interest or support in personal advancement, and interaction with uneducated people with inappropriate behaviour decline creativity and work efficiency.

A professional in the healthcare industry spends many years, even decades, gaining expertise in the specific field and continuously updating knowledge. More new information makes us realize that the oceanic body of data is partly available for use and understanding. So far, no one may be proud of knowing and perfectly operating them.

Humility: 'Be like the bamboo: the higher you grow, the deeper you bow' - Chinese proverb.

There is a work hierarchy, and each practice has its work value. Being professional in relations with others is mandatory.

Handling data quickly and efficiently ensures you can maintain the equilibrium between the production process and relaxation. Experts in the domain who accumulate fatigue can make errors in practice, which harm both the receiver and the creator of the error. In those moments, they realize they are worthless. Saying sorry when you make an error is necessary – be professional. You must recognize your failure and do your best to repair the fault. Intense adverse reactions from offended people may destroy the vulnerable construction of the offender. Therefore, a professional approach to such conditions is required.

Passion can cause an individual to deviate from norms in daily life, and errors in social life can cause grief for others. Consequently, the individual realizes they aren't perfect, and their ignorance and arrogance decline.

Even having the best intentions and selecting the best way for the best doings, unexpected barriers may arise to fail. Failure confirms your weakness in checking, avoiding, blocking, and getting rid of them.

Vigilance decreases at the end of life since time slowly undermines everything. Sometimes, this happens early, originating in medical conditions. As a result, your capabilities change, making you aware of your limits in the community.

Each can best do a specific work, as instructed. Achieving a high position with a low education is inadvertent. Inappropriate self-importance follows failure, provoking distress around. Self-regarding your power and adjusting when it does not fit the requirements is essential. Friends, loved ones, and specialists in a specific area make you aware of your misunderstanding and act to take a good path. When your desires exceed realities, more self-reflection on your limits validates your imperfection, experiencing humility.

Like in a beehive, there is an order in life and the world. We must respect and be respected by each contributor empowered by God.

The Bible: 'Do not think of yourself more highly than you ought to think.'

God's supremacy is eternal.
